

I am writing to suggest that the FCC not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. I have been extremely pleased with the effect this law has had regarding unwanted sales/solicitation calls. I receive only a few calls each month, if that. I had been getting calls as often as 4 times per week. This law allows me to live in my home without having my privacy invaded. I am no longer bothered with insistent sales persons and can be assured that when my telephone rings, it is a call that I will most likely want to take. I can't say enough good things about this law and what it says to the companies that believe they have the right to come into my home without my permission. Please do not consider adopting a national standard which would lessen the "protection" I currently enjoy. Thanks.
